SUPERMAN LIVES!

Photo / Jimmy Olsen

by Lois Lane

For almost two minutes, the heart of Metropolis stopped beating.

Last night, Superman fought for his life in a S.T.A.R. Labs operating theater, where a handful of specialists, metahumans, and friends secretly battled to save the Man of Steel from an inconceivable threat--internal poisoning from Kryptonite, a rare element thought all but extinguished on our planet.

Superman was poisoned months ago by a mercenary known as "La Encantadora" (Spanish for enchantress) who tricked him into ingesting a microscopic robot armed with a Kryptonite payload. The nanobot began converting Superman's own body into living poison, one cell at a time. The long-term attack was designed to overtax and subsequently cripple the Man of Steel's ample immune system.

La Encantadora was not the sole conspirator. Although she claims to have no knowledge of the malefactor who enlisted her services, authorities suspect another party engineered the plot to destroy Superman. This was evidenced when Deathstroke, known assassin and former government operative, attacked La Encantadora in order to ensure her commitment to the operation. She resisted and approached this reporter, offering her assistance in the hope of saving Superman.

The incredible technological wi dry of JLA reserve member T Atom allowed Supergirl, Steel and perboy to literally shrink down to croscopic size and enter Superm bloodstream, where the offen nanobot was discovered and destr In addition, Steel confirms that re ing poisoned cells were removed

RE: ACTION

It's somehow fitting that the senses-shattering conclusion to Y2K would elicit the most reactions from the DC message boards. Let's have a look, shall we?...

Dear Re:Action:

Y2K was by far the best story yet, and it's all because of the ending. ACTION #763 was fast, clever and gave the best ending I have ever read. Congrats to Messrs. Kelly, Kano, Garcia and Alquiza. Man, I love Luthor.

Thanks, JerEl, but the important question you should ask yourself is what Luthor thinks of you. After all, he loved his daughter, Lena, and look how that turned out!

Dear DC:

My faith in the Superman books is finally being restored. I liked the Y2K storyline, and the ending of ACTION #763 was excellent. Anyone who doubts just how far Lex Luthor will go in order to better himself has to read this book. His line to the effect, "No loss, I can make another," was chilling. Watch out, Lex—you done hacked off Superman good.

Dear Re:Action:

Whoever thinks that Lex Luthor acted out of character at the end of ACTION #763 obviously hasn't been reading very long. Ever since Lena was born, Lex never really loved her the way a father loves a child; she was simply a tool to be used, to extend his control over the city past his own lifetime. Every time Lex was shown with Lena, he would always talk about how "One day this will all be yours" and "My empire will be passed on to you." Lex didn't think of Lena as a daughter—only as a pawn in his game of world domination. I thought his actions at the end of ACTION #763 were completely on point, and I didn't even see it coming.

Joe Kelly is doing great things for this title. I'd like to see, maybe ten years down the line, a teenaged Lena return to Metropolis for her revenge on dear old Daddy...

Don't be surprised if something like that happens, Dan! Let's face it, gang—Lex plus offspring equals trouble! Look what happened to his other children, which will garner a Baldy to the first letter-writer who can remind us!

Very glad he's not a Luthor offspring.
